THURSDAY EVENING, AUGUST 26

THE CAPITAL OF MALTA,-Valetta is s e almost at its best as you appro c'i it from the sea. The rest of Malta appears dreary enough, with its endless succession of stone walls, rising one above another from the hidden fillds and gardens that slope up to the inland hights, and making the island seem from a distance little more than the desolate rock which in remote times it was. When you get near to Valetta the view is more attractive and imposing. Jutting boldly our into the blue Mediterran an is the rugged promontory on which stands Fore St. E mo, made stronger now by English skill than over it was before, but, except for its light house, looking just as it might have look d when, more than three centuries (g), the Knights of St. John er cled it to be an imprezpable barrier avaiust all asserlants by nea

To the left and to the right are the yourger but still venerable Fort Ricasoli and Fort Tigne, serving as gates to the noble bays, part satural, part artificial, that stretch island on either side of Fort St. Elma-one of them the Grand Har bor, in which the Mediterranean flet has its central station, and to which trading ships generally reson; the other the Marsa Muscetto now usually known by the less dignified title of the Quarautine Harbor, too shallow for large shipping, but none the less attractive on that account. It is a long day's work to row round the magic in and out of all the inlets of these two harbors, the larger one commanded by Fort St. Angelo, from which the order of St. John fought its way to possession of the whole island, the other by Fort Manuel, the latest of the great engineering works set up by the Or der for its protection.
